TACCP & VACCP Food Defence Biovigilance Bioterrorism

One Day

Since the publication of ISO 22002:2009, (Prerequisite programmes on food safety for Food manufacturing), food defence, biovigilance and bioterrorism have become a topic of debate and concern for many food business operators. PAS 96 : 2017, (Defending food and drink), is the recognised publicly available standard which advises Food Business Operators (FBOs) how to construct and implement the necessary controls to assure its customers that their products are safe and secure.

The latest BRCGS Food Safety Issue 9 has significantly increased its expectations on food defence and food authenticity. The expectations on site security have been moved to Clause 4.1 with additional requirements in Clause 5.4, 'Product authenticity, claims and chain of custody.'

PAS 96 focuses on the six threats to the food and drink industry from economically motivated adulteration, ideologically motivated groups, criminals or individuals with a grudge who may wish to damage an organisation. PAS 96 provides broad guidelines to FBOs which should help them assess and reduce the threat to their business and to mitigate the consequences of an attack. The risk is different for different businesses, operations and products. It is therefore implied that different risk assessments will result in different action plans proportionate to an individual situation.

It is assumed that FBOs are aware of HACCP or similar risk management procedures, crisis management and business continuity management principles and have effective procedures in place. The TACCP (Threat Assessment Critical Control Point) study should be integrated into the existing Food Safety Management System thus ensuring control of all reasonable hazards and potential threats.
